The New Fashions in Houses

With approach of Spring, the building industry, like the blossoms of May, holds high promise of burgeoning. Already we may see on every hand the signs of increasing activity. In St. Louis and its suburbs, and in the outlying towns to which the faithful automobile carries us upon our Sunday outings, many new buildings are beginning to sprout. If we do not drive too rapidly we may absorb a few fresh ideas as to the uptodateness of most of the new business blocks and residences.

It is highly interesting to compare today and yesterday, not to speak of the day before yesterday, in house construction. Such comparisons help one to foresee fairly accurately what tomorrow's new house is going to look like. Change, which usually means progress, is characteristic of all human industries; and in that of house-building it speaks for itself in a voice not to be misinterpreted.

This is not to insinuate that modernness means "loudness" in structural style or pattern. There are, to be sure, fashions in houses as in clothes, but it is probable that human garments exceed human habitations in the matter of startling changes from the old to the new. All of us must wear garments, and all of us must "wear" some sort of house as well. The big idea should be, and no doubt is, to fit both the temporary garb and the more nearly permanent realty encasement to the wearer. In both cases the ten-

Instead of trying chiefly for speed the next time you motor about city or country, why not take a look around and study the new fashions in houses? If you do so and can discover anywhere a truly old-fashioned new residence or business building, your capacity as a close observer will be proved. People nowadays go in for something different from what the past generation seemed to re quire. There is, for instance, none of the geographismess of 25 to 50 years ago. There is more of beauty and less of the ornate. It used to be considered the proper thing to stick on a considerable number of assumed embellishments which added not a jot of comfort or usefulness to a house. We have passed far beyond that stage of construction. What we demand now—if the houses built within the past few years and those going up today on every hand be any criterion—is comfort, convenience, and as much of the commodious as the purse can stand, without making the house look like a baronial castle counterfeited.

Compare, let us suggest, the new dwellings with those you find in the older downtown sections of St. Louis. You will find that mere size cuts little figure now. A small house of recent build is very much more attractive to outside view, and undoubtedly more attractive and more convenient on the inside, than any of the oldtimers. These later patterns are spick and span. They combine all tractive and more convenient on the inside, than any of the oldtimers. These later patterns are spick and span. They combine all the most modern of accessories. Even the smallest of the new homes—the infants in the human habitation family—are superior in dency, perhaps more than ever heretofore, is to increase the comfort and at the same time to enhance the attractiveness quire. There is, for instance, none of the gewgawishness of 25 to 30 years ago. There is more of beauty and most respects to the big fellows which have housed a generation or so of people, the operations of the various branches of the building industry. It makes the business of the supply houses, of the material handlers, of the contractors and the workers livelier and more lucrative. Say what you may, things in the building line—and in every branch thereof—are up and going now, and this fact you cannot fail to observe if you keep your ever open when you have the contractors and the workers livelier and more lucrative. DISHEARTENED.—A fancy georgette scarf would be appropriate to wear to the formal affair, in order to cover the scar which causes you so much embarrassment.

JIM.—Communism is a doctrine which would abolish individual rights, including the ownership of property. It began in England and France but has never made much progress. Socialism is allied to communism, but is a milder form. It does not suggest the abolition of individual rights, but to make all rights subordinate to the good of the people. An acceptable definition of either has never been presented, and members of both parties differ materially. Some of our ablest scholars and investigators believe that socialism will become prevalent.

SOCRATES AND HIS PUPILS.

Socrates: I suppose you noticed that Congress has increased its pay? Glaucon: Yes.

Socrates: Don't you think it rather amusing that after doing everything it could do to make the cost of living high Congress itself concludes that it must have more money to meet it? Glaucon: It is amusing, but I suppose Congress will do all the laughing. Socrates: That is, you don't think it will muse most people who are not in a posttion to increase their pay?

Glaucon: No. Socrates: Perhaps you are right. . I felt amused. Why I should be I can't imagine Congress first puts us all in the hole by making a tariff to suit the big interests. and when the consequences of that tariff fall upon us Congress lightly removes itself from the casualty list by raising its pay. Polemarchus: I can't raise a laugh over that to save my life.

Socrates: You are quite right, Polemarchus. I was in the wrong when I laughed about it. Assuredly there is nothing amusing in the situation. People who have given most of their lives to the creation of a livelihood within modest bounds find themselves hurled back upon an income less than they had 10 years ago. Only those who feel the lesser purchasing power of the dollar think of it in post-war terms; employers as a rule think of it in pre-war terms. Thus we have a considerable intermediate stratum which is slowly being submerged. It cannot force an increase in its income, as union labor canits cannot increase the price of its output as the employer can.

Thrasymachus: Perhaps Coolidgius will make Congress share the misery of its own class by vetoing the raise.

Socrates: By Jove, that would be a proper commentary upon the perfidy of Congress! What a hero Coolidgius would be to many of us did he veto the increase and send it back with a message saying: "I cannot see how Congress can conscientiously increase its own income as long as it keeps the Fordney-McCumber tariff law on the statute books and thus increases the living of so many people in no position to Surely one needs make no apology in bringing out a murder number of a book page. It has been one of the chief diversions of humankind, every since Cain, in a fit of peeve hardly consonant with the relative serenity of his times, perpetrated his utterly inartistic slaughter of Abel. Without it Euripides would have been a dull fellow, Shakspeare no more than a comedian of sorts, Edgar Allen Poe the dingy genius of an editorial office. Why, the very history of the Habiri, as recounted from the very history of the Habiri, as recounted from She's a girl after me own heart." deed, it is quite impossible to imagine this best of all possible worlds without the thing.

And our interest in murder still continues. To be sure, the uplift from time to time turns gnashing on the matter and exerts its influence to stamp the practice out. Nevertheless, every now and then one of us has a going-out, and the rest of us hustle breathlessly to view, vicariously through the press if not actually in person, the corpse. Indeed, there is coming to be, among the more cultured, a greater and greater delight in every new slaying of actually aesthetic qualities. It was de ided that on the night of every murder in New York City good enough to make page one in the papers, the club would dine. As guests of honor vould be invited the newspaper men who had cov ered the murder and the murderer herself; it was expected, however, that now and then it would be impossible to get in touch with the lady. At the conclusion, the murderer and the reporters would be asked to describe the deed, and the evening would end with a general discussion of it from esthetic and psychological points of view.

Eventually the club collapsed, some of the members becoming tired of boarding together.

HELPING THE SCHOOL CHILD

ELPING the school child with home work does not mean to do the work. The parent can give valuable assistance and the wise parent will keep in close touch with the child's work and new school methods throughout school life and give help when necessary.

"It is easier to do the example than get it into his head," said an impatient father. "May cannot understand long division. She hates so I have to do all her examples for her," remarked a well-meaning "Somehow Bert cannot grasp Latin and I have a time every evening to get Ruth to do his translations for him," complained another mother. In one family the mother insists upon the older children doing the home work for the 'get so nervous over it."

It would seem as though every thinking parent would realize that this is no help whatever to the oung student.

Under the widely existing conditions home work is very much a farce. The average child has so many outside interests. There is the music which demands at least an hour's daily practice. Often there are dancing and swimming lessons. Rehearsing for school and church entertainments takes up considerable time.

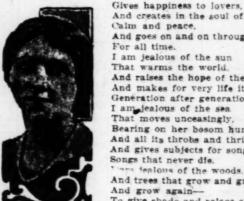

Girls have home duties to per form and many boys are little wage earners after school hours. Outdoor exercise is essential to good health; the movies are a great magnet for young folks, and after dispatched the school work must be rushed through in order to secure sufficient sleep; therefore, in the majority of cases, this is lone by others than the pupil.

Therefore, it would seem that home work might just as well be abolished and other means of study devised. It would be a great advantage to the pupil to prepare all school work under efficient super-vision, which means under the direction of teachers who are capable and ready to direct and give help. Supervised study in school means study under the best condi-

This might readily be made possible by lengthening the school day a bit, so when the child leaves the school building school duties are ended for the day, just as is the case with employes in the great
